If you're among the 32% of Brits that gamble on a weekly basis and are thinking of applying for some form of credit in the near future, you might be wondering whether your activity could affect your Credit Rating and your chances of being accepted.

Where it becomes slightly more complicated is if you use a credit card, rather than a debit card to fund your online account, or if you are about to apply for something that will involve a much closer examination of your personal finances and where you spend money, such as a mortgage.

Thankfully, single instances of a cash advance shouldn't be an issue, so if you've ever accidentally used the wrong card at a cashpoint, you should be okay.

Your Credit Report and the information it contains will play a huge part in your ability to get credit - especially when it comes to 'bigger' financial commitments such as a mortgage - but it's not the only consideration. Where most products with smaller monthly payments are concerned, lenders will usually be happy to rely on the information contained in your Credit Report to reveal your current borrowings, sometimes backed up with questions relating to your regular outgoings.

It's important to remember that underwriters aren't there to make a moral judgment.

In some cases of course, that's easier said than done, and if you are worried that it is becoming a problem, there is help available.
