Prior to the introduction of the Gambling Act in 2005, the world of online betting was almost entirely unregulated. One of the main things that the United Kingdom Gambling Commission required of gambling companies was that they obtain a licence (see example above). The Gambling Commission is constantly trying to ensure that the rules and regulations are as tight as possible, ensuring the safety of the most vulnerable. The hope was that they would allow operators to verify a customer's age and identity much faster.

Verification Documents Required

Licensees are required to let customers know what form of identity will be accepted, as well as what circumstances might lead to a customer needing to provide further details.

It's not uncommon for someone to use a banking method that doesn't belong to them to place bets, so companies will ask for more proof of identification

Regardless of the reason, anyone who flashes up as being a suspicious bettor will be asked for ID in excess of the identification given when first joining a site.
