From the perspective of the company, the scam is now a done deal. However, there's still a package on its way to an unsuspecting person, and when it arrives , it creates a lot of confusion as to where it came from.

It may sound like a bizarre scam that doesn't see any real-world use, but it is actually common enough to see news coverage on the topic.

When a company initiates a brushing scam, they use their own funds to send you the item. They may have your name and address, but they typically don't have your financial details and aren't buying the items using your money.

If you receive a package that you did not order and is not a gift, report it immediately. [...] You don't need to return the item.

However, be really careful of the company trying to scam you a second time. There's a reason why countries have laws about unsolicited goods, and it's to protect you from a different kind of scam.

As such, keep an eye out for any correspondence from the company that sent you the item. They may try to trick you into thinking you need to pay for the goods they sent you, but as we covered earlier, you need not fork out money for unsolicited items.

Brush Away Those Brushing Scams

Although the United States convinced the appeals panel that these laws were "not necessary" to protect public health and morals, the asserted United States defense on these grounds was ultimately rejected because its laws relating to remote gambling on horse-racing were not applied equally to foreign and domestic online betting companies, and thus the United States could not establish that its laws were non-discriminatory.
