You might be aware of how important online reviews are, but did you know online reviews can change 67.7% of purchasing choices?

Customers use online reviews to help them determine if a business or product is trustworthy. Positive reviews have become key for the success of businesses.

All businesses want positive, genuine reviews online. But are they allowed to pay for them? According to the Federal Trade Commission, reviews must be authentic and credible.

These positive ratings affect purchasing decisions, and this is often a numbers game of getting the most reviews. So businesses might be weighing the pros and cons of engaging in this activity.

Without directly paying for fake reviews, businesses can still find ways to generate more reviews from real customers. Some owners choose to offer a discount or free deal if a customer leaves a positive review. Some debate the ethics of this type of practice, but it falls within the gray area of the legal system since these are actual customers.

Another way to generate more reviews is through email campaigns. Businesses can include instructions for how to leave online reviews and where they'd like the client to write them.

The same practice can be done through social media. So if a business has a large following, they can leverage this to request online reviews.

Focus your efforts on creating a campaign to get customers leaving your business
