Kansas legalized sports betting in 2022, after a legislative race which saw it beat out neighboring Missouri.

DraftKings is the sole mobile operator in the state, though there are a handful of retail betting locations that have opened or intend to do so.

There's been no political movement to legalize sports gambling in North Dakota, but state tribes have already opened retail sportsbooks under authority granted to them by the federal government, a similar legal path for the sports betting launch in New Mexico.

Mobile betting had some initial hiccups in West Virginia, but it's been fully live since August 2019.

A robust market would be a difficult task in a state with only three tribal casinos and no lottery to run online betting.

The tribes getting their way doesn't mean it will be in-person sports betting only in California - last year, a group of tribes proposed online and retail sports betting, but it didn't qualify for the ballot.

It would give the state's 11 tribes exclusive access to betting, dealing out racetracks and pro sports teams.

Yet the House vote on sports betting was carried by a Dem majority. The report into the
