It's not a credit card fraud thing; it's because those banks haven't yet opted in for accepting gambling as an acceptable card purchase, says Allen

Ambrogio, director of operations at online gaming company Tipico.

Higher interest rate: Many cards charge a higher annual percentage rate for cash advances than for regular purchases.

Lower credit limit: Some credit cards have a separate cash advance credit limit, which is lower than the overall credit limit.

They instead offer ATMs that can accept credit and debit cards to dispense cash.

What about state lotteries?

Add to that the potential credit card gotchas, such as cash-advance fees and interest, and you have more downsides that could kick in when you pay for gambling with a credit card.

Gambling as occasional entertainment with money you can afford to lose is one thing.

"Each type of payment used for gambling - from cash to credit cards to PayPal
