But, when it comes to these two games, the fact that they are both table games that use cards are pretty much the only similarities that they share.

Blackjack, for example, requires players to make decisions, know basic strategy, and even count cards.

Then, online casinos entered the picture and changed things forever, including how people think of these games.

While that is perfectly fine, as long as they understand what they are doing, there are also many who are the polar opposite of this approach.

Now, it is important to note absolutely every casino game has a house edge, which is what allows the casinos to make a profit and stay in business.

This is why players who prefer strategizing tend to go for the games like blackjack, where the house edge is only 1%, at least when the player who plays the game has at least the basics of blackjack strategy.

That's pretty much it, as the dealer does all the rest. All you need to do is place your chips in the required place, the dealer will play out the hand for you, and you pretty much don't even need to know what is going on.
